The Daily Press.

HONGKONG, SEPTEMBER 11th, 1897.

REFERRING to the dismissed police officers, the China Mail still maintains that abstract justice has nothing to do with the case. There are, however, not many, even in official circles, who coincide with our contemporary. It is generally recognised that a mistake has been made and that it must be rectified as far as possible. Apart, however, from the question of justice, the interest of the public and the interest of the officials are at one in demanding that the dismissals from the public service should be made only on good and sufficient grounds substantiated by evidence. Dismissal on the ground of moral certainty of guilt, without adequate proof, would establish a pernicious and dangerous precedent which might in future be invoked to the prejudice of officials of any department or rank, and in the nature of the office is notoriously conducive to abuses of all descriptions. The official members of the Executive Council, when they come to deal with this matter again, will no doubt be mindful that the passage of Scripture, "For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged," and with what measure ye mete, "it shall be measured to you again," may be capable of literal fulfilment in their own case, and that not only justice but expediency also demands that the same measure of fair play should be meted out to the suspected members of the Police Force that each one of the hon. gentlemen would expect for himself were in charge of delinquency of duty brought against him.

Failure to discover a particular gambling house is an obviously absurd charge upon which to sentence an officer to dismissal and forfeiture of pension. The medical staff might as well have been dismissed for failure to discover the plague on its first introduction to the colony in 1894. Men may fail to discover anything and it is utopian to suppose that we shall have a Police Force of such perfection that no crime will remain undetected. In fact the Captain Superintendent himself might as well be dismissed for failure to discover the corruption that was going on in the Force and of which he knew nothing until it was brought to his notice by direct information. If, however, it can be shown that there has been genuine neglect of duty on the part of the dismissed officers, a culpable lack of vigilance, but without guilty connivance with crime, and the offence is held to require a substantial penalty, the officers concerned might be adequately punished by the loss of a certain number of years' seniority of rank or compulsory retirement on a reduced pension. If there were any legal technicalities in the way of a rational treatment of the cases, which we do not believe there are, the difficulties could be overcome by passing a special Ordinance, which the Government could obtain any afternoon it chose to call the Legislative Council together.

Indeed, if the question of law be gone into it is doubtful whether the whole of the proceedings thus far taken against the men are not manifestly illegal ab initio. Section 22 of the Police Ordinance provides that whenever any subordinate officer or constable shall be guilty of any neglect or violation of duty he shall, upon conviction, forfeit before a Magistrate in a summary manner, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding two hundred dollars, and in default of payment thereof be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding six months. Then comes section 24, which provides that the Governor may dismiss upon the representation of the Captain Superintendent any constable, or any other person, who is not a constable, and a substituted power? It may be argued that the men should first be taken before the Magistrate and, then, in the event of conviction, the Governor may, on the representation of the Captain Superintendent, dismiss them. In some cases it might be deemed that the punishment by the Magistrate sufficiently purged the offence, while in others it might be deemed undesirable that the offender should continue in the Force. It may be to meet the latter class of cases that section 24 is provided; and that before it can be brought into operation there must be a conviction before a Magistrate. This seems probable, because if a conviction by a Magistrate is necessary for the imposition of a fine of $200 it is absurd to suppose that a fine of ten or fifteen thousand dollars, the capitalised value of a pension, can be inflicted without trial, and, moreover, if the evidence against the accused man was not deemed strong

HONGKONG, SEPTEMBER 11th, 1897.

REFERRING to the dismissed police officers, the China Mail still maintains that abstract justice has nothing to do with the case. There are, however, not many, even in official circles, who coincide with our contemporary. It is generally recognised that a mistake has been made and that it must be rectified as far as possible. Apart, however, from the question of justice, the interest of the public and the interest of the officials are at one in demanding that the dismissals from the public service should be made only on good and sufficient grounds substantiated by evidence. Dismissal on the ground of moral certainty of guilt, without adequate proof, would establish a pernicious and dangerous precedent which might in future be invoked to the prejudice of officials of any department or rank, and in the nature of the office is notoriously conducive to abuses of all descriptions. The official members of the Executive Council, when they come to deal with this matter again, will no doubt be mindful that the passage of Scripture, "For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged," and with what measure ye mete, "it shall be measured to you again," may be capable of literal fulfilment in their own case, and that not only justice but expediency also demands that the same measure of fair play should be meted out to the suspected members of the Police Force that each one of the hon. gentlemen would expect for himself were in charge of delinquency of duty brought against him.
